

ABSTRACT

A method for the detection and characterization of fluid behind the tympanic membrane. More specifically, a method for differentiating between infective and non infective effusions behind the tympanic membrane in animals, particularly humans, and more particularly, human children, based on analysis of the rheological properties of the fluid using an ultrasonic source.